LEGOLAND and Merlin Entertainments

On 7 June 1968, Godtfred Kirk Christiansen, son of LEGO founder Ole Kirk Christiansen, opened the first LEGOLAND park at the headquarters of the LEGO Group in Billund, Denmark. The idea of building a family play paradise of colourful LEGO bricks turned out to be a huge success. And so, from the 90s, the company began to promote the concept in other countries too. It all worked out well: the eight LEGOLAND parks are now among the most important amusement parks in the world. The LEGOLAND concept celebrated its 50th anniversary in 2018, and is still widely popular.

When Godtfred Kirk Christiansen opened the first LEGOLAND park in Billund, Denmark on 7 June 1968, the new world consisted of MINILAND, an impressive LEGO railway line, a puppet theatre, a small Indian camp, and a driving school. Christiansen did not expect a lot of visitors back then, but the very first season already exceeded the expectations of everyone, counting more than 625,000 guests. Within half a century, LEGOLAND had gained unprecedented success. Fifty years later, the now eight LEGOLAND parks in Europe, America, Dubai, Malaysia, and Japan are among the most notable theme parks in the world.

Investing in Günzburg

LEGOLAND Windsor opened in 1996 west of London. Only three years later, this was followed by the first LEGOLAND park to be open year-round in Carlsbad, California. Germany has had its own LEGOLAND in the Bavarian town of Günzburg since 2002. Back in 1999, owing to its geographical and structural qualities, the Günzburg location prevailed against Japan’s capital Tokyo in the decisive final round. The park had already received more than 150 million euros in investments by the time it opened, and so already featured all the highlights of its predecessors as well as countless new attractions. To this date, the LEGOLAND team has had the pleasure of welcoming visitors from over 120 countries, who all shared a memorable family experience in the world of LEGO.
The district of Günzburg has adapted very well to the public and became a family and children-friendly region with numerous leisure and holiday offers, all tailored to the LEGOLAND target group. Today, LEGOLAND Deutschland Resort belongs to the top amusement parks in Germany. LEGOLAND Florida, the second park in North America, opened in 2011. Malaysia followed in 2012 as the first LEGOLAND in Asia, and along came Dubai in 2016 and Japan in 2017. New parks are already under construction in New York and South Korea.
